

A young Muslim man has been watched closely [REDACTED] for over two months now. His emails have been read [REDACTED] [REDACTED] [REDACTED] His telephone conversations have been listened to [REDACTED] and his facebook page has been watched [REDACTED] [REDACTED]

Throughout all of this information, there is [REDACTED] evidence that clearly shows [REDACTED] that he is fanatical [REDACTED] He [REDACTED] dreams about blowing himself up [REDACTED]

The evidence that he has been gathering [REDACTED] shows how well planned he is. It proves that [REDACTED] there is an immediate threat [REDACTED]

[REDACTED] he would like to reach his ultimate goal [REDACTED] He strongly believes that he [REDACTED] should be sacrificed, simply to make a better future for others. He knows [REDACTED] this is how it was meant to be [REDACTED]

A young Muslim man has been watched closely by his pet dog for over two months now. His emails have been read by the person he sent them to. His telephone conversations have been listened to by his annoying little brother and his facebook page has been watched by 433 people that he has never met.

Throughout all of this information, there is the odd piece of evidence that clearly shows – or probably would if anyone could be bothered to check it properly – that he is fanatical about jam. He loves making it but has bad dreams about blowing himself up in the process.

The evidence that he has been gathering through his research project at school shows how well planned he is. It proves that raspberry jam is more popular than strawberry. However, he doesn't think this means that there is an immediate threat to strawberry jam.

Actually, he would like to reach his ultimate goal and see both doing well. He strongly believes that he would never get over it if strawberry jam should be sacrificed, simply to make a better future for others. He knows that some think this is how it was meant to be but he is too busy eating jam sandwiches to listen.